Commentary

The Select International Alpha Fund returned +4.85% for the month to be up +17.94% for the 2024 fiscal year (net, after fees). The focus on disruptive technology has helped with the strong performance of the fund.

Moving into the second half of the calendar year, global growth continues to moderate from the robust momentum last year. Importantly, conditions remain expansionary and the expectations of lower rates in 2025 with many key developed economies will be supportive. The pace of fiscal spending in the US remains a headwind and many other economies relative to historical averages. This has underpinned the strong labour market and continues to place pressure on core inflation.

We anticipate lower cash rates from the US Fed and other major global central banks but not toward levels that the market has seen over the past fifteen years. Some easing by some global central banks but higher cash rates for longer remains the core theme. The trade-off between the positive but slower growth pulse combined with limited rate cuts will be supportive for markets. Equity valuations and credit markets are suggesting a measured slowdown in activity with lower rates going forward.

The record election year globally continues with both the French and UK Elections now behind us. The bond market will continue to observe the forward estimates for the new UK government to gauge the appropriate long bond yield. The lower inflation pulse is a positive and should lead to lower cash rates from the Bank of England (BoE). The French election result appears more problematic.

With regard to China, the market is looking towards the Third Plenum in July to look for any guidance to the economic policies and proposed reforms from Beijing for the coming year(s). The second largest economy has focused on the higher manufacturing led quality growth via technology and green transition, while simultaneously benefiting from a preferential diversified energy mix that emerging economies can operate under. This robust and lucrative export led growth focus has led to trade tensions with many key developed economies. Trade tensions with the US are anticipated to remain.

While there has been little policy support to drive China domestic demand and consumption as a greater proportion of their growth mix, investors will look for any fiscal and land development reforms. The property correction in China has been of historical proportions and additional government policy support should go a long way to help improve the property sector and sentiment within mainland China.

Locally, the RBA continues to navigate the dilemma of persistent core inflation data. The strong fiscal stimulus, robust ongoing labour market combined with aggregate earnings growth, all imply the RBA will keep rates higher for longer acknowledging that the market is pricing in the prospect of another rate rise.

The overweight and focus on disruptive technologies is the core investment theme from the London based investment team lead by Mark Hawtin (who have managed this fund since January 2023).

The global Fund remains overweight to quality Tech (including AI and cloud) which have been key contributors to the performance. Overweights include Microsoft (MSFT), Alphabet (GOOG), Meta (META), Seagate Technologies (STX), Amazon (AMZN), PayPal (PYPL), NVIDIA (NVDA) and Apple (APPL).
